this book investigates doodles are powerful narrative and psychological practice that transcends its conventional dismissal as idle or decorative expression positioned at the intersection of literary studies visual culture and psychology this book argues that doodles function as cathartic narratives non verbal yet deeply expressive forms through which emotions are processed negotiated and released focusing on selected novels by karen romano young the study examines how visual storytelling operates alongside textual narration to articulate inner emotional states particularly those marked by anxiety vulnerability and self reflection the doodles embedded within these narratives are read not as marginal embellishments but as integral storytelling devices that shape character psychology narrative rhythm and reader engagement by foregrounding the therapeutic and expressive dimensions of doodling the book highlights its role as a medium of emotional resilience especially within adolescent and coming of age narratives drawing upon theories of catharsis graphic narrative and psychology the book offers an interdisciplinary framework that bridges literary criticism with psychological inquiry it also situates doodling within a broader historical and cultural context tracing its evolution from marginal scribbles to a legitimate form of visual communication through close textual and visual analysis the study demonstrates how doodles create spaces for emotional release where language alone may fall short intended for scholars of literature visual culture psychology and education doodles as cathartic narrative contributes to contemporary debates on multimodal storytelling and challenges traditional hierarchies that privilege text over image ultimately the book invites readers to reconsider the doodle not as trivial but as a meaningful and transformative narrative act
